

NEVADA TRANSLATORS

With over 100 mountain ranges in the Silver State, Nevada television stations don't have the same signal reach as television stations in the Midwest or East Coast. Translators make it possible for television stations in Reno and Las Vegas to be seen in remote communities like Carlin and Pioche, although residents of suburban communities like Carson City and Stead get their over-the-air broadcast signals from a combination of translators and originating stations.

Translators are small, low power television transmitters that include a receiver to pick up distant signals, amplify them and then re-broadcast them on a different frequency or channel. Most of Nevada's almost 400 translators are owned and operated by local government agencies such as county governments or independent, voter-approved general improvement districts, such as TV Maintenance Districts. In these cases, the cost of maintaining and operating the translators comes from taxpayers through the county or city General Fund or an assessment on property owners. Television stations own a fraction of the translators in Nevada and there are a few translators that are privately owned.

While the FCC regulates translator broadcasting, the Federal Government did not require translators and low power TV stations (LPTV) to end their analog transmissions in 2009. Translator operators may choose to upgrade to digital or continue broadcasting in analog. Either way, viewers need to know what's going to happen to the translators they are watching so they can be prepared for the coming changes.

Viewers in some areas may find that they will receive both analog and digital signals. In that case, they will need to purchase a converter box with the "analog pass-through" feature that will allow them to receive both signals. Viewers in areas where their translators will continue to operate in analog will not need a converter box or any other equipment at this time. However, at some point, the government will require translator operators to upgrade to digital so those viewers should take advantage of the current government coupon programs.

Translator operators also need to know whether the signal they are receiving is going to be digital or analog in order to continue providing service for their viewers. And some local government officials have decided to end their translator operations to save taxpayer dollars.

As a result, the Nevada Broadcasters Association surveyed the owners of the almost 400 translators and low power stations in the state to determine what they plan to do when analog broadcasting ends in 2009. The results of that survey are documented below by community. You can find out if you will need a converter box by going to the community in which you live and following the listings for the translators that serve that community. The chart will indicate what the licensee has told us they plan to do after the digital deadline. For more information on preparing for the digital conversion, go to www.dtv.gov.
